11	When he was a teenager, George Washington discovered an unexpected skill: He could read the landscape, looking at its ridges and hills, and then transfer what he saw to paper. Many years later, as General Washington in the American Revolution, he wrote about the lack of dependable battlefield maps. He solved that problem by making his own maps, based on "such sketches as I could trace from my own Observations." In December 1776, looking at the landscape as a general, he placed the Delaware River between himself and the British Army by setting up his camp at a place in ...*
